Italian Colony Unhappy On Tierra del Fuego

BUENOS AIRES.—All is not going well with one of the world's most unusual immigrant resettlement schemes—the colony of 1,000 Italian immigrants on the island of Tierra del Fuego, which forms the southern side of the strait of Magellan.

Last year the Peron government closed down the country's notorious prison colony there, shifted its inmates to the mainland, erected additional housing and made way for the bodily transfer of an entire factory from Italy to that antarctic outpost.

Since the first enthusiastic welcome given the hardy pioneers by the press here, news from the colony has been slim. In recent weeks, however, several newspapers, including a local Italian periodical, have reported that the rigors of readjustment have resulted in considerable disillusionment.

The peasant element among the settlers has taken well to the island's sheep-raising, its chief industry, according to these reports. But the workers, many of them in skilled categories, are said to be ill-prepared for the rigorous climate. The temperature occasionally drops to 15 below zero.

Major discontent has arisen over the wage-and-employment policies adopted by the Bolsani corporation, which was transplanted from Italy. Promised a wage of three pesos hourly (60 cents), the workers complain that while this might be adequate in a more temperate climate, it is inadequate on the island.

Milk Pelletizing Aids Poultry Feed

Milk Products Are Found Important to Egg Output

That milk products are still among the most important ingredients in a laying ration is indicated in results of a series of feeding tests conducted with high-producing flocks in New England poultry areas earlier this year.

The tests, which ran an average of 164 days, were conducted at a state agricultural college, a county vocational agricultural school and commercial poultry farms. Results showed an average additional profit of 26 cents each for hens fed milk products in addition to rations regularly fed on the test farms.

Joseph Ruzzo, Hope Valley, R. I., is shown at his egg candler-grading machine. Raising from 12,000 to 13,000 birds annually, Ruzzo says he has recorded a 12 per cent increase in egg production from his test flock which was fed pelletized milk products in the 1948-49 laying season.

Nearly 3,000 birds, New Hampshires, Rhode Island Reds, Barred Rocks, and a Barred Cross were involved. On each farm flocks were divided into test and control pens. The control pen received the ration normally fed on the farm. For instance, the state college fed the New England college conference laying ration, the county school used its own formula ration, and the commercial poultrymen fed various commercial laying mashes. In each case test and control pens were of the same age and breeding, and received the same care and management except that the test pen was fed a pelletized dairy products feed in addition to the normal ration. Accurate feed cost and egg production records were kept. For purposes of making profit comparisons, 55 cents a dozen was used as an average egg price.

When results were tabulated and averaged, it was found that the test pens fed the milk product, laid an average of 8 per cent more eggs and made an average of 12.3 per cent more profit. Egg production for test birds averaged 64 per cent throughout the tests, compared to 59 per cent for control birds. Average feed cost per dozen eggs was 29 cents for test pens, 28 cents for control pens. Culls and deaths in test pens averaged 15 per cent.

Highest average egg production was 74.4 per cent made by a test pen of Barred Rocks at the county school over a six-month test period. There the control pen averaged 69 per cent production. Birds in the test averaged $3.06 net income per bird (eggs over feed), compared to $2.71 per bird in the control pen.

Private Planes Fail to Match Use Prediction

CHICAGO. — A postwar world where everyone flew his own airplane and traffic cops of the sky kept the Sunday "flivver-fliers" in line has failed to materialize.

In fact, sales of private airplanes in 1949 ran approximately to only 6,000, whereas it had been freely predicted that more than a half-million civil aircraft would be in operation within 10 years after the war. Compared with 1946, when manufacturers sold 35,000 light planes for personal flying, the 1949 total was down some 600 percent.

Causes for the slump in sales of airplanes are legion says Leslie A. Bryan, director of University of Illinois' institute of aviation. He attributes chief costs to the still high prices on aircraft. Poor marketing may be another, he adds, plus high operating costs, limited utility, lack of safety, high depreciation, high insurance costs, inadequate service facilities and disturbing noises.

However, he pointed out that all these factors were similarly troublesome in the early years of the automobile.

Causes Lessening

Bryan said he found that most of these causes are lessening, just as they did with the progress of the horseless carriage. It is only a question of how soon, he says, there will be a transportation medium combining the best in the plane and the best in the automobile, although better than either is today.

Nevertheless, during the last year declines appeared in the number of airports, private pilot certificates issued, flight hours in operation, and personal aircraft manufactured. He sums up these elements of the private flying picture this way:

Airports—"It is probable 7,500 properly located airports would give a passably adequate landing area coverage for the United States," he says, adding that at the start of this year there were 6,414, with Texas in the lead with 624.

In addition, the airport operators council estimates 77 million dollars is available in state and municipally sponsored funds to match money granted under the Federal Airport Act for airport construction.

Half-Million Pilots

Pilots—There are now about 900,000 licensed airmen in the United States, or about five pilots for every registered airplane. Of this number, 10,000 are certificated air-line transport pilots, 210,000 commercial and 280,000 private. Then, there are over 100,000 student pilots.

Flight instruction now averages around $8.50 an hour, compared to $25 an hour and more before the war. It takes between 30 and 40 hours of instruction to obtain a private pilot license, including at least 10 hours of dual instruction.

"In many respects the present-day 35-hour pilot is equivalent or superior to the 200-hour pilot of 20 years ago, because of better standards of controlled instruction," Bryan declares. "Air training is now an established part of education in many schools, being taught both as a vocational and as a cultural subject."

Nylon Plastic May Give Aid To Many Arthritis Victims

BOSTON. — Thousands of crippled arthritis victims have a chance of being able to walk normally again through the use of nylon.

Two Boston doctors—Dr. John Kuhns and Dr. Theodore A. Potter — have evolved a technique employing nylon which enables arthritis sufferers to move their wasted knee joints again.

A translucent sheet of nylon plastic is used as a "shock absorber" between the knee cap and the leg bone to prevent painful rubbing as the joint is articulated.

Treatment of damaged knee joints has bogged down in the past because the cushion of healthy tissue separating the bones has been eaten away. Attempts to insert tissue from the thigh between the knee bone ends failed to help.

Nylon plastic, the doctors said, had the advantages of not irritating the tissues, not absorbing water and not being affected by chemicals.

Billie Burke Keeps Vitality By Standing on Her Head

NEW YORK.—Billie Burke, perennial comedienne of stage and screen, has a bubbling vitality that is the envy of myriad people half her age. How does she do it?, they ask.

She does it by standing on her head.

That's no flip crack, it's a fact. In a recent interview, she declared she spends at least 10 minutes standing on her head, turning somersaults and stretching.

She revealed one or two secrets that make it possible for one who was on the stage 50 years ago to look as young and pretty and be as vivacious as she is. She said that standing on her head is part of it.

"It gets the blood to the brain," she explained, "and that's good for any thinking that has to be done. I suppose it's also good for my feet and the rest of me."

Recalling that the great Caruso had once asked her to marry him she said she had answered "no" because of the tenor's two big sons.

"I told him I just couldn't figure out what I could do with those two huge creatures and that seemed to end our romance."

Cincinnati Police Present New Hallowe'en Procedure

CINCINNATI. — The local police department came up with something for Halloween which ought to end a lot of policemen's troubles if adopted generally in the future. Instead of their chasing the pranksters that night, they had the pranksters chasing them.

Why? The answer was so simple everyone wondered why he hadn't thought of it. The police simply gave away 10,000 bags of pretzels to the kids, the distribution being via police cruisers.

Put Skunks to Sleep If You Would Move Them

TROY, OHIO.—If a family of skunks took up residence in your basement window, how would you evict them?

Mr. Coleman Allen, a widow who lives on the outskirts of Troy, had that problem.

Her first idea was to have the skunks shot. But she quickly dropped that one when a neighbor explained that the animals could retaliate with an odor that would drive her from the house.

Five boys, who heard radio station WPTW's account of Mrs. Allen's problem, provided a simple solution.

They put the skunks to sleep with ether and carried them away.
